Pediatric Crohn's disease is often associated with complications involving anastomotic recurrence at the site of a previous ileocolonic or ileorectal anastomosis. Prompt evaluation of a suspected anastomotic recurrence is crucial for patient care, as the disease is frequently extraintestinal. Management of pediatric patients with suspected Crohn's disease recurrence depends on the age of the patient, the extent and severity of the disease, and the timing of the anastomotic recurrence. Crohn's disease recurrence is not common in children. In a large series, the cumulative probability of disease recurrence at 5 years was only 0.3% \[@CR1\]. However, up to 3% of patients with Crohn's disease develop complications at the site of a previous anastomosis \[@CR2\]. A Medline search using the terms 'Crohn's disease' and 'anastomosis recurrence' and using the reference list of the articles retrieved yielded a total of 26 articles from which data could be extracted concerning pediatric patients. In the literature, there are 4 different types of anastomotic recurrence: (1) stenosis of the intestine, (2) small bowel obstruction, (3) massive fistula formation, and (4) bowel perforation \[@CR3\]. The majority of reported patients with anastomotic recurrence were adults. All patients had a history of previous ileocecal resection. The most common time for disease recurrence is 1--3 years after operation. The treatment is based on the type of recurrence. Therefore, the patients with stenosis or obstruction will be referred for endoscopy,
