KeyVault - Allows the user to automatically separate multipage tiff images into smaller documents, based on the barcoded batch separator. Rats with chronic visceral pain have changes in sensitivity to some forms of noxious stimulation that are reversed by oral oxycodone. In rats with an experimental model of visceral hyperalgesia (VH), there are increases in the responses to spinal administration of NMDA (N-methyl-D-aspartate) in animals that show abdominal contractions after colorectal distension. Oxycodone has been shown to suppress these contractions and, in acute experiments, to inhibit the NMDA responses in vitro. The present study examined the effects of chronic administration of oxycodone on responses to spinal NMDA and morphine in these same rats. Noxious stimulation of the rectum was produced by infusing a 10% solution of gelatin into the rectum. In addition, sham animals received an intrarectal infusion of saline. In each animal, behavioral responses to colorectal distension and mechanical stimulation of the hindpaw were measured at regular intervals after surgery. All animals received 4 days of daily intragastric oxycodone treatment (5 mg/kg). Five days after the start of oxycodone treatment, oxycodone, saline, and oxycodone plus saline were administered intrathecally. Noxious stimulation of the rectum produced both increased contractions of the abdominal wall and higher behavioral responses to mechanical stimulation of the hindpaw. Following chronic administration of oxycodone, the increases in behavioral responses to mechanical stimulation were attenuated. This effect was not seen with the saline solution. Spinal NMDA (5 mM) caused increased behavioral responses and lower abdominal contractions in both oxycodone-treated and control animals. However, responses to NMDA were significantly reduced in oxycodone-treated animals. The behavioral responses to morphine were not affected by oxycodone treatment. The results demonstrate that chronic oral administration of oxycodone attenuates some of the effects of noxious stimulation in the chronic visceral pain model, suggesting an opioid receptor-mediated mechanism.in the left hand turn over toward the right... it looks like your hand makes a small "up and over" movement with the thumb... there is a slight wrist flexion as well... and you are ready to place your right hand on top of the left... you are about to do the "Two 77a5ca646e
