Arthur Latimer is a building manager who carries on his job as if it will never end. He is 53 years old and about to become an octogenarian. He lives in a tenement with a great many stairs and an unpredictable boiler, which has for some time given him a headache. Latimer, who is part of the working-class community of East End London, has come to believe that the United Kingdom's housing market is like the housing market in New York City: a gilded cage that has imprisoned many middle-aged people, and has exacerbated the impact of Britain's worsening economic situation. In both countries, homeownership is declining and rents are rising. Young people are especially vulnerable: more than half of 18- to 35-year-olds were homeowners in 2016, but the figure is just 34 percent for those aged 35 to 44. All of this is happening even as President Donald Trump tells millions of Americans that they deserve to own a home. According to a Pew Research Center analysis of the 2012 and 2016 presidential election returns, among those who believe the Trump campaign promoted the idea of a two-income family, Trump supporters were more likely than Hillary Clinton supporters to agree with the statement, "We need to make sure that every young person can afford a home." Latimer believes that the economic uncertainty around him makes him a prime candidate for affordable housing, and he is searching for ways to jump-start the market. Like many of his contemporaries, Latimer's wife has lost her job, and the couple has been hit hard by the rising cost of housing. Their one-bedroom flat, in Newham, east London, is worth about $80,000 and has a market value of about $225,000. The use of computers and data processing systems has grown rapidly in recent years. Such systems are commonly used to process a large amount of information within a short period of time. The vast amounts of information can be processed in a number of ways. One way is to read and display data on a display device, such as a video monitor. This is typically accomplished using a data processing system and a data display device. One such data display device is known as a liquid crystal display (LCD).
