Hempstead Public Library The Hempstead Public Library is a public library serving the residents of Hempstead, New York, US. The library was built in 1895 and is located in downtown at 3 West 37th Street. History The Hempstead Public Library was founded on September 27, 1885, with 12 members on a $2,000 donation from the public for a library building. By 1894, a library of was opened. The building is a three-story brick structure with cast iron trim. It was designed by architects Peter W. Schaeffer and Louis Schaeffer, who were based in the New York City office of William A. Polster & Company. The library grew quickly, adding branches in Clarkstown, New Castle, North Hempstead, Port Washington, and West Hempstead. In 1905, a new building was opened to house the Hempstead Public Library. The new building was designed by Charles A. Krum of the New York firm Krum and Schaeffer. The building was designed to be reminiscent of an English village hall, with many cast-iron and white oak details. In 1911, the library began renting space to the West Hempstead High School, which moved to a new school building in 1929. In 1969, the school and library merged to form the Hempstead-West Hempstead High School. Starting in 1977, the Hempstead Public Library used microfilm to lend out books, rather than renting them from a publisher. These movies are still found on microfiche. In 1979, the Hempstead Public Library had 43,000 volumes and 1,500 registered borrowers. In 1990, the library began using microfilms that could be checked
