HONG KONG (Reuters) - Chinese social network Tencent Holdings has reached a preliminary settlement with the U.S. government over the allegations it collected user data without the consent of its users, a person briefed on the matter said on Thursday. The agreement is preliminary as the two sides discuss its details, the person said. The complaint by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) alleges that from 2011 to 2014 Tencent systematically harvested data from its users, including their location, friends, calls, texts, and the content of emails, video calls and other internet communications. The information was gathered as part of a "data mining" campaign by Tencent that went beyond targeting advertising at individuals, the person said, and was instead used to target consumer products.

Tencent has repeatedly denied the allegations, and called the FTC's action "unfair, unjustified, and unfounded". "We intend to reach a settlement with the FTC, and the settlement will reflect Tencent's full and complete cooperation in assisting in the FTC's investigation," Tencent said in a statement to Reuters. The person said the FTC might wait until Tencent is legally bound to settle before publishing the terms of the settlement. Tencent, the world's largest social network in terms of monthly active users, was formed by a merger between video game maker Qihoo 360 and the Chinese internet company Sina in 2012. As part of the settlement, Tencent may have to write off some of its ad revenue, the person said. The FTC declined to comment. (Reporting by Chris Alderton; Editing by Ros Russell)The summer of 1960. Almost exactly 35 years before the day on which 2d92ce491b
