Good news for the American public -- and for the beleaguered U.S. auto industry -- as BMW and Daimler have announced that they will form a global alliance that will see the creation of a new company called "BMW AG + Daimler AG" and the creation of a "new global business alliance" that will combine the financial strength of the two German automakers and the commercial strength of their respective auto brands. The move has been prompted in part by the fact that Daimler is part of a €10 billion ($13 billion) bailout package put together by the German government to help it weather the impact of the current recession. BMW was also helped by a €10 billion bailout package last year. The two automakers will have joint legal entities and joint venture agreements, with Daimler retaining its shareholding in BMW (60 percent) and BMW having a 40 percent share in Daimler. While the details of the merger have yet to be announced, the agreement was announced jointly by the two automakers in a press release, signed by their respective CEOs, and sent out to the media. In fact, BMW's CEO, Norbert Reithofer, and Daimler's CEO, Dieter Zetsche, signed the agreement together. "This global alliance is driven by our shared strategic intent," Zetsche said. "We want to create a strong commercial platform that will deliver enduring benefits for our customers and employees." "BMW and Daimler have been delivering quality products and services for more than a century," Reithofer said. "By joining forces, we will accelerate the development of innovative mobility concepts, and create a strong base from which to continue delivering increased profit growth in the future. This step represents a significant milestone in our cooperation, and ensures our common future." Under the joint arrangement, the new company will have nine main business units: four in the automotive sector, two for financial services and three for other business segments. "This step allows us to continue our joint development work and to accelerate our plans to develop a broad portfolio of premium passenger vehicles and premium mid-size and light commercial vehicles," said Reithofer. "At the same time, we will expand our successful partnership with Mercedes-Benz by providing the largest selection of vehicles in Europe and
