The KEYMACRO system consists of two parts: an input device (keyboard) and a program which allows the user to input words and/or characters into the computer. For example, the word "Hello" can be entered using the keyboard by pressing the keys: KEY, H, E, L, L, O. After the user enters the word, it is immediately compared with a list of words stored in a data file in an attempt to find a match. The program outputs the matched word if the words stored in the data file match the input word, and a non-matched word if the input word does not match any of the words stored in the data file. The matching words can be stored in the data file for future use, while the non-matched words can be displayed to the user. The program continues to search through the list of words, one word at a time, until it finds a match, at which time it then displays the matched word to the user. If no match is found, the user is asked if he or she wants to try again. To try again, the user must reenter the input word, and the program resumes its search through the data file.
