It has emerged that the department is planning to cut funds for 28 teaching staff, including a further 13 teacher-trainers and one coordinator, as well as several administrative support staff, including four in the secretary's office. It is expected the move will see teaching staff across the state's primary and high schools lose $1.5 million over the next four years. It comes after education workers and parents held rallies across the state last week to condemn the funding cuts. Mr Smith said the funding cuts could not go ahead while the State Government was reducing teaching staff in western Sydney, as it would mean the state would no longer be able to attract teachers from the school's in the region.
