Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a housing for a head suspension device, and more particularly to a housing for a head suspension device, which is capable of enhancing the shock absorbing performance of a unit on an upper part of a disk drive part, wherein the head suspension device includes an elastic member for buffering an external impact force applied in a vertical direction and an upper part of a base part. 2. Description of the Prior Art A hard disk drive (hereinafter, referred to as an HDD) is employed in various fields such as a computer, a cell phone, an MP3, and a camcorder, etc., and as the HDD has a high storage capacity of up to hundreds of gigabytes, it has been used for many portable devices. In particular, when the HDD is installed in a computer, a lot of data can be saved and it is possible to transmit data or record sounds with a high-resolution. The HDD is a representative example of disk drive systems, in which the spindle motor is installed on the bottom of a housing, a magnetic disk is disposed in a case, and the magnetic head is installed on an end of a suspension arm, and thus the suspension arm is installed on the housing and connected to the magnetic head. The suspension arm is an elastic member, and the suspension arm elastically moves up or down according to the vertical movement of the magnetic head, and thus is used for buffering an external impact force applied in the vertical direction. Meanwhile, in a basic state, in the case of the HDD, no external impact force is applied in the vertical direction, and thus there is no need for additional shock absorption, but when an external impact force is applied to the HDD, an elastic member installed on the top part
