In the August 2014 Rethink Education issue, I wrote about the business case for the eradication of a medical degree. This argument now holds true for every profession, including education. As David Lipman and David Moss put it, 'The science is clear and simple: education is the place where we learn, we teach, and we train.' But what if education was part of the problem? Imagine that every old bemoan about our education system was true. Imagine teachers with low expectations, disincentives to teach in a way that would improve students' lives, and unqualified, uninterested students. The public can't imagine such a scenario. Teachers teach. Students get an education. Good for them. Who cares if education is inefficient and we spend a billion dollars or more every year just getting students to pass the tests? We can't be spending all that money if we're not learning anything! Right? I know it's not true, but it's what the public thinks. There's a better way to make education work: redesign it. 'Better' means much, much better: less time wasted, less money spent. I wrote about this in the summer edition of this newsletter, but here I'll summarize the ideas. First, it's 82138339de
