Originally developed as a drafting program, AutoCAD has since evolved into a multi-purpose CAD/CAM application that offers 2D and 3D design and drafting capabilities along with a variety of features including electrical design, 3D animation, engineering and architecture. Unlike other CAD/CAM applications, AutoCAD does not limit users to a specific geometry element, rendering, or operating system. This has led to the emergence of a myriad of CAD/CAM plug-in applications for AutoCAD. These plug-in applications have a variety of uses, including creating, editing, or converting specific geometry objects, creating, editing, or converting CAD/CAM drawings, or exporting AutoCAD drawings to other CAD/CAM applications. In addition, there are also functions for XML scripts. Both the Python programming language and JavaScript are supported to import, edit, and manipulate the XML directly using Python and JavaScript. The Python API was based on the AutoLISP, and AutoCAD used AutoLISP when AutoLISP was included on the AutoCAD software. This resulted in a large code compatibility. Developers can create plugins, customization tools and applications for AutoCAD or for other products. In particular, AutoCAD's Interoperability Technology (IT) allows exchange of data between products based on a standard, XML format. In AutoCAD 2018, the built-in Python scripting functionality is part of the new API system based on Python3, called AutoCAD Studio and is available as a tab on the ribbon. AutoCAD 2018 adds Python in addition to the previous Visual LISP and AutoLISP. On June 10, 2019, the company announced Autodesk Exchange Apps, a program that allows third-party developers to access and automate CAD drawing and project workflow tasks. Autodesk Exchange Apps (AEAs) are standalone tools written in the C# programming language. Building blocks AutoCAD uses CAD-based technologies as its primary building blocks: References 5b5f913d15
