To a hypothetical issue of "that there must be eventually a correct answer to a question can there be a correct answer to a question on the ontological status of numbers," Professor Stoljar rejects the idea that numbers are fundamental ontological entities. Instead, he claims that numbers are humoral. And the best characterization of numbers is that they are part of the quantitative aspect of a humoral theory. It's fascinating to think of numbers as part of some grand theory of things. But of course in a description of nature, it's not so obvious what's a part and what's the whole. Which is to say, it's not obvious whether numbers belong with matter
