Using this tool you can now also change cloud mapping to give you the information about the surface properties you want the map to provide. Once the user is familiar with the objective set and the method of solution in a cloud map, it is possible to use the image-mapping technology in conjunction with the data visualization tools to provide all the information they need in a solution. This can be done using the JCS or MIP databases. The data visualization tools available in three different formats are: AAROL - a proprietary image format for the Residential Imaging Program (RIP) at NASA, which provides a standardized user interface and compatibility. \TECHNOLOGY BIOSTAT - a source code based interface for building, running, and maintaining 3D data visualizations for specific applications (not any specific computer system).  BASIC-RIP - an interface based on AAROL, which allows users the ability to use RIP data directly from 3Dsurface. Keycodes - the codes used to facilitate the flexibility of the data generators; current supported Keycode Format is KITTIT-L, with a.MAP extension. Changes made to the data - the data files generated by the tools in one form or another are related to changes made to users' data. Time of Creation - the time of the active storage of the 3D code base. Date of Create - the date of the creation of the file. Copyright - the focal point of the software, typically the copyright date of a data file. This is derived from the work of the author. Limitations - the limits of the user's freedom of the use of the peculiarities of the GIS software. Comments - reservations about the data
