Treatment with aprepitant, an orally active neurokinin-1 (NK1) receptor antagonist, in women undergoing moderately emetogenic chemotherapy. In most studies of moderately emetogenic chemotherapy, antiemetic therapies are evaluated in the morning on the first day and in the evening on the second day. However, little is known about the efficacy of antiemetic therapy in the evening on the second day in the same patients. This study was designed to evaluate the efficacy of aprepitant, an orally active neurokinin-1 (NK1) receptor antagonist, in the evening on the second day in women undergoing moderately emetogenic chemotherapy. In this single-center, open-label, randomized, parallel group, single-dose study, women receiving moderately emetogenic chemotherapy were randomized to a double-blind treatment arm with either a single dose of a single aprepitant 40 mg tablet in the evening on the second day or standard ondansetron 8 mg intravenously (IV) twice per day in the morning on the first day and in the evening on the second day of chemotherapy. Patients who received single-dose aprepitant were also treated with aprepitant 80 mg IV and famotidine 20 mg IV on the first day, and aprepitant 80 mg IV and ondansetron 8 mg IV twice daily on the second day. No other antiemetic medications were permitted. The primary efficacy outcome measure was the proportion of patients with complete response (CR) (no vomiting, no use of rescue antiemetics, and no rescue use of prophylactic antiemetic medication) on day 2 and day 3. Secondary efficacy measures included frequency of vomiting episodes, occurrence of vomiting-related adverse events, and median time to first episode of vomiting during the 120-h postdose period on both days 1 and 2. The study enrolled 239 patients; 123 were randomized to receive single-dose aprepitant and 116 to standard anti
