Jarnal Info: Name: Jarnal Developer: Google/Project Jarnal Supported Formats: JPEG/PNG/BMP/GIF/HTML5 File Size:

98.7 MB Supported Languages: English Google Chrome Beta for iOS has been available for some time now, and it's finally been made available to Android users. Being one of the most popular browsers used by iOS users, Google certainly deserves a little attention before they unveil something which is surely going to be the next big thing. The new feature which is likely to spark some attention is the new shortcut functionality. While most browsers already provide shortcut functionality, Chrome Beta for iOS seems to offer more options. Not only can you have a shortcut on a home screen, but also the ability to bookmark a webpage for later, and then find it again in the bookmarks, along with access to the History. While most browsers may offer options for this functionality, it seems like Chrome Beta is going to deliver the experience which will make you fall in love with the app. The new feature which will be available for Android users, and probably for iOS users in the near future, is the ability to have a custom URL bar. What this means is that you're able to access a website with a custom URL, meaning that your current web address might be something as simple as my_website.com, or even more advanced as example.my_website.com. This functionality isn't available yet, but hopefully it's ready for iOS users and a huge win for users. The new feature which will certainly save you some time, is the ability to share a web page with specific links to information. This is probably the best feature to come out of the new release, allowing for sharing of a link to a website with a particular set of information. While your current web address is likely to be www.example.com, you can simply set a link for a page with the specific information which will make it easier for people to access that information. 6a5afdab4c
