Often, the reason for this is that the Windows registry has more than one layer of files. This is a very bad practice. When we talk about the Windows registry, we are not talking about a simple database of your installed applications. Your Windows registry is the all-powerful but unreliable list of hundreds of thousands of important files, key values, and key paths. If you remove a key or value from this registry, your Windows operation system might shut down or might simply not work. This means that the best thing to do if you're in the habit of uninstalling software is to save any registry edits to a backup file. To do this, you need to create a backup of your registry first. This is easy with the freeware utility RegBack. This utility allows 77a5ca646e
