About The sound of an acoustic guitar played by a man with a preponderance of warmth, who plays by ear, blends and meters, but sounds like he lives in a mansion... and he is a genius, but he's an odd one. --Alan Powell Learning Always have a notebook with you. Learning is no longer restricted to classroom environments. You'll quickly discover that you're a much better (and more original) musician when you're trying to create something new. You always have a notebook with you. Things to go into it: ideas, bits and pieces of music, chords, sounds, rhythms, musical oddities, um, you name it. Be it notes or notes repeated over and over again, in any place or any order, and usually starting with fiddly little odd-shaped sounds like those made by a "Waltz My Bear" toy, or a Perspex spinning top. I learned to compose using this method. On the odd occasion that I miss the chance to record everything, or I want to try out a new idea, I simply write it all down and try and play around with it, repeating a musical idea until it fits better. I was at my aunt's house and watched her playing a melody on a zither. I thought about the different ways you could shape up the "brings" of the notes, and thought there had to be a way of doing this on a keyboard. So, I started my own lute and made a few attempts at it, and wondered how it might sound if I played the notes on a synthesizer. My interest was music, not what a lute should sound like, or something totally outside the realm of what I'd thought of as normal. Over the
