Our previous results indicated that macrophages transform non-lipoprotein triglyceride into cholesterol ester, perhaps at a rate that is greater than their own rate of production. In this way the macrophage removes cholesterol from LDL which, because of its high affinity for specific apolipoproteins, is preferentially and rapidly cleared from the bloodstream by hepatocytes. In addition, the macrophage likely deposits cholesterol in its own cell membranes. The mechanism of this transformation is unknown. Recently we have identified a macrophage membrane protein of 97 kDa that binds with high affinity to LDL. The 97 kDa protein may mediate the uptake of LDL in this cell. Two aims are proposed. The first is to identify the macrophage 97 kDa binding site on LDL. We will use monoclonal antibodies for this purpose. Second, we propose to identify the binding site(s) on the macrophage binding protein. We have already purified the 97 kDa protein and raised monoclonal antibodies to it. We have identified the trypsin-sensitive domain of this protein by N-terminal sequencing. We will determine whether macrophages remove cholesterol from LDL through a species-specific binding protein. These experiments should help identify the role of the macrophage in the homeostasis of the low-density lipoprotein, in the selective uptake of LDL by hepatocytes, and in the accumulation of cholesterol in this cell.The effect of short-term salbutamol inhalations on airways and lung function in preterm infants with bronchopulmonary dysplasia.
