Q: What is the difference between a ThreadPool and a thread? What is the difference between a ThreadPool and a thread?

A: Your question is a bit misleading, since the two concepts are tightly coupled. A thread pool is an implementation of a thread pool; a thread is an implementation of a thread. The thread pool is a mechanism for managing a bunch of threads (it's the pool), whereas a thread is something you can create, and run on a pool (that's the thread).

A: Simply a thread pool is a mechanism where you can define and manage a number of threads. A thread (in Windows) is a normal program flow/execution control structure. It's a kernel object that allows you to run some code in the context of a separate execution (or scheduling) thread. There's quite a lot of articles on Stack Overflow that go into more detail on this.

A: A thread pool is a mechanism of managing a number of threads. A thread is something you create to do work.

Ultrasonography in the diagnosis of acute appendicitis. The diagnostic accuracy of ultrasonography in the evaluation of the presence and type of acute appendicitis was compared with the diagnosis made by surgical exploration in 50 patients. The ultrasonographic diagnosis was correct in 42 (84%) patients and the correct decision was made in 48 (96%) patients. The results of ultrasound were found to correlate well with the findings of the surgical procedures. Furthermore, ultrasonographic examination appears to be more sensitive in the evaluation of patients with equivocal surgical findings, such as generalized abdominal pain and a positive Widal
