I have been looking at PHP and Ruby on Rails. From what I have read PHP seems to be very easy to learn, but it also seems to be a bit harder to learn than Ruby on Rails. Is there any advantage to learning PHP over Ruby on Rails? If you have experience with either, which would you choose? A: I find that PHP is easier for beginners, as you can start coding really quickly, and get some functioning code up and running very quickly. Ruby on Rails is actually harder than PHP, since you need to read up on what all of the framework needs to offer, whereas PHP is just web programming on steroids. A: If you're developing a CRUD web application, it doesn't really matter what language you choose. But if you're developing a full-blown web application, where you have a main site (that you will host yourself) and a lot of smaller services that are just serving some of the features (such as a webmail or messaging system), then I would actually advise to go with Ruby On Rails, as you have this advantage, that you have a completely separated environment for your system (for example, your web application could even be run as a separate 'virtual machine' on your server). I would also recommend that you try them both, then decide, and compare some samples of each that you like. Ethereum (ETH) has recovered over 50% against Bitcoin (BTC) and is currently trading at $219.25, nearing a peak of $245 that was reached earlier this week. Prices saw a strong recovery following the cryptocurrency's drop of up to $40 over the past few days, when commentators said that both projects Ethereum (ETH) and Bitcoin (BTC) appear to be heading for a "correction," but nonetheless, long-term bearish signs are still evident in the charts. Ethereum Price Chart Ethereum (ETH) is currently trading at around $219.50, having spent the previous session in a bull market with a gain of more than 21%, according to CoinMarketCap data. At press time, ETH is still down over 14% against Bitcoin (BTC), trading at $216.23 at press time, after briefly testing its previous low of $192.46.
