The analysis of the occurrence of natural catastrophes in the United States over the past 35 years involved a rigorous database search and data analysis from the United States Geological Survey (USGS) and other data sources. "This study is important because it is the first large-scale, systematic examination of the evidence on building codes to reduce the number and/or severity of large-scale natural disasters," said Dr. Doug Diekema, USGS geosciences research manager. "We found little evidence that building codes can help with this and it is reassuring to the public that building codes are not the silver bullet that they have been told they are." The most common disaster types were earthquakes, wildfires, hurricanes, floods and mudflows. They cause $178.6 billion (US
