How to improve Google Photos: How to get the most out of Google Photos Google has introduced a new feature to its Android app that should help people choose which images from their smartphone camera roll they want to share via the Google Photos app and also enhance the quality of those photos. The announcement was made at Google I/O in Mountain View, California, where the company unveiled a major update to Google Photos. The update is available as a preview to anyone who has the Google app installed on Android phones and Google Photos will roll out to everyone as a later update. Google Photos will now allow users to increase the quality of photos they take on their Android devices and choose which of those photos to share. This is not the first time that the company has taken the effort to improve the quality of images taken on Android, but the update brings more control to those taking photos than ever before. The new feature works by using an AI to analyze the photos that people take and upload to their Google Photos account. If it recognizes a good-quality photo, it will increase the resolution and quality of the image. If it deems a photo to be of poor quality, it will simply cut out the area of the photo it thinks is the best part. The update also has a selection of "Smart" modes that Google says will "narrow down the photos that show the best quality of a particular category." For example, the company says that the Smart mode will automatically crop out any people from a group photo and it will also switch to black and white mode if it detects a good-quality photo of a sunset. But the update will also use its AI to improve the quality of photos that are not in Google Photos and the company says that "it can remove noise from the photos, reduce blur, and correct red eyes." Like many of Google's Android products, the Google Photos app on Android works across all of Google's operating systems including Android, Chrome and iOS. Google also revealed that the company was working on a number of new features, including an AI that will recognize and classify objects like people and animals and will learn as it learns. The company says this will "make Google Photos
