But in one respect, there is a certain symmetry to the contest. As people read the third presidential debate between Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton, Canadians have been reading the third Leaders' debate, sponsored by the Conference Board of Canada, between Justin Trudeau and Andrew Scheer. Neither man has produced a knock-out punch, but this is Canada's really first fight for the leadership of the free world. In comparison with the Clinton-Trump contest, the Trudeau-Scheer contest has lacked some of the theatrical character. They have not been abusing each other in front of the crowd. Rather, the two men have sat down at the proverbial table, and shared some of their views on priorities and challenges. But when it comes to the fundamentals, the contest is over. Unless there's a new development in the Electoral College, Donald Trump will be America's next president, and Justin Trudeau will be Canada's. The United States has gone from the "shining city on a hill," to a banana republic, said the prime minister. As for Canada, the prime minister argued, the interests of this government are now aligned with those of the United States. The main reason is that the U.S. currently has the largest economy in the world. What 'shining city' could fail to admire the world's biggest skyscraper? Trudeau said that the 'sanctimonious lectures' of the political elite are now at an end, and Canadians can be proud of their record. He's right. But here's the catch: Donald Trump was elected on that same
