Want to learn to read your hockey stats? Our hockey group is going to help you learn how to read and interpret hockey statistics. Your friend Mickey, who is sort of a spaz, likes a lot of stats about hockey. He's even written a small program that shows which player and position from your favorite sports site is most productive. First, he'll walk you through how a stat is calculated. Then we'll move on to figuring out whether to buy or sell and then you'll be whether their talent lies in one area or the other. 2. Stats are different for different players. There's no general hockey stats. For each player, there's a different stats. For example, who has a higher career shooting percentage or goals per game? If you're looking for an opinion, you can use the goal stats for all players. Puck possession is the best way to determine the
